Admiral Anderson, who replaced Admiral Burke as Chief of Naval Operations, came to see me this morning. He has an attractive personality.

During the tea break at Cricket, I left and went to the office, before attending a dinner tonight in the dining hall of the Middle Temple. The members all put on gowns for dinner. It was a particularly festive affair. The Master Reader made a witty address; otherwise we confined ourselves to conversation, eating, and drinking.

The Philippine Ambassador, Melquiades J. Gamboa, came to call this morning. He has a law degree from Oxford University, and was professor of law at the University of the Philippines for twenty years. For ten years, he was Counselor of Embassy at Washington. From 1956 to 1958 he was Ambassador to India, becoming in the latter year Deputy Permanent Delegate to the U.N., from which post he arrived here last month. He seems amiable and friendly.

John Correll had a lunch at the Embassy today in honor of the United Kingdom delegation to the 46th session of the International Labor Conference. I attended it. The English guests were:

Harold Ford Rossetti, Deputy Secretary, Ministry of Labour
Gordon Charles Henry Slater, Under Secretary, Ministry of Labour
W. A. Treganowan, Labour Adviser to the Foreign Office
George Foggon, Labour Adviser to the Secretary for Technical Cooperation
Ernest Meredyth Hyde-Clarke, Director of the Overseas Employers' Federation
Harold Collison, Member of the Trades Union Congress Gen. Council.

Charlie White, recently retired as Chairman of Republic Steel Corporation, came to see me. He is disturbed about the shrinking profit margins in the American steel industry, and believes foreign competition will continue to impair them.

Stephen Bechtel called on me. He has had a remarkably successful career in business. I imagine, amongst other engineering achievements, his firm has
